This book explores the intersection of craft, design and sustainability in the developing world. It argues that most sustainable design approaches and efforts fall short of implementing holistic sustainable design paradigm. Renewable materials such as bamboo, cork and hemp — which are abundantly available in the developing world — have the potential to be a viable resource base for sustainable development. Current sustainable design initiatives and approaches already recontextualize these materials using industrial techniques and technologies. However, these efforts fall short of impacting holistic sustainability and tend to focus on the ecological aspect. This book offers the development of one alternative to design for holistic sustainability praxis and craft. Holistic sustainability praxis and technologies. As Christians, were faced with challenges from multiple fronts. We love the idea of Gods free gift of salvation, but many of us dont give a lot of thought to the risks we are expected to take to deserve that gift. We go through life making excuses for our shortcomings and failing to risk your money, children, friendships, enemies, freedom, family, pride, reputation, or marriage for God? Are there risks you should be taking that would leave no doubt that youre serious about this Christian walk, or are you just going through the motions, believing God will work it all out? Is that all thats expected of you? Reading this book will help you examine your life and compare it to characters in the Bible who were willing to take the risk and some who chose not to. God expects more from you than lip service, and he is worth the risk.
