and frustrating. Textbooks often present a plethora of information without adequately connecting it to students' background knowledge. Connecting new ideas and facts to already known information helps students remember and understand new ideas. Graphic organizers have long been used as an educational tool to help create visual representations of textbook ideas. The purpose of this study was to determine if mind maps, one type of conceptual graphic organizer, would improve test scores within a fifth-grade social studies class over an eight-week period. The study took place with four classes of students. Two of the classes received instruction, practice and time to utilize mind maps within the Iowa history curriculum. The other two classes did not utilize mind maps. A total of 39 students participated in the mind map treatment group and 44 students were in the non-treatment group. An initial rating scale survey, a post rating-scale survey and two pre and posttests were given to the treatment group. The non-treatment group did not
