Excerpt from The Church in Hawaii: The Bishop of Honolulu's Letter on the Affairs of the Mission, With List of Subscribers and Statements of Account, for the Year Ending 30th September, 1881 I omitted to write you a Letter last year, and have allowed two years to pass without sending you any Statistical Returns. To make some amends for these delinquencies, I now send with my Accounts for the year, the present Statistics of the Mission, which show a small increase on 1879. The number of Clergy has risen from four to nine - five Priests and four Deacons. The Communicants are now 316, against 227 in 1879; the number Confirmed in the two years being 70. I do not intend writing a long Letter, for the way seems clearing for me to pay a brief visit to England, which I trust may be productive in many ways of good results to the Mission and, if I am not disappointed as I was at the beginning of the year, I hope to have Opportunities of giving many of you a further account of the condition of the Mission than is possible in a Letter.

Whilst good Madame Béju, whose legs were shaking under her, was carrying out the doctor's orders, the superintendent of police kept watch to see that nothing was touched. The doctor's attention was concentrated on Jacques Dollon. Monsieur Agram was searching for some indication which might throw light on the drama. So far he had been unable to formulate any hypothesis. Should the moribund painter return to consciousness, the explanation he could give would certainly clear up the situation.
