The best marijuana is the one you grow yourself. This is something that cannot be totally explained in logical terms, but still every grower, even the first-time novice, knows that his plant has the most healing and mind-altering, most appreciated effect, while contradicting all rational propositions that dictate quality/potency status. In other words, your own harvest works magic for you. The consumption of cannabis has become too much of a recreational experience that has generated around it a whole industrial mechanism that is forced to play by the market rules, falling in the consumerist trap of producing a lot, in shorter time, with less resources and less attention. The result is an underground niche market infused with poor quality marijuana, that's been produced for a single reason, to stone you into numbness, more or less like a unidirectional kick. But this particular effect is nothing without the complexity of sensations, mind-altering perceptions and the soothing ability to calm your brain and body instead of just putting them into a vegetative state. This profit driven common practice has practically set a baseline of economic efficiency and as collateral, consumers are already accustomed with only this particular effect and this particular perception of the use of marijuana - therefor the public attention was distracted from the real beneficial properties of this incredible plant used as a natural remedy for millennia.
