Girls mean business in The Startup Squad: Face the Music, the second novel in the series, which Kirkus Reviews calls “an enjoyable and diverse story highlighting friendship, entrepreneurship, and perseverance.” Harriet’s brothers are hoping to enter a local battle of the bands. Winning could get them on a reality TV show! But low funds have left them without even a working guitar. The Startup Squad jumps into action—and quickly pulls together a plan to sell T-shirts to raise money. The girls have a lot of great ideas—until everything starts to go wrong. When all the problems start

Wexler stumbled across a hidden explanation for our country's frustrating lack of progress when it comes to providing every child with a quality education. The problem wasn't one of the usual scapegoats: lazy teachers, shoddy facilities, lack of accountability. It was something no one was talking about: the elementary school curriculum's intense focus on decontextualized reading comprehension "skills" at the expense of actual knowledge. In the tradition of Dale Russakoff's The Prize and Dana Goldstein's The Teacher Wars, Wexler brings together history, research, and compelling characters to pull back the Physical inactivity is a key determinant of health across the lifespan. A lack of activity increases the risk of heart disease, colon and breast cancer, diabetes mellitus, hypertension, osteoporosis, anxiety and depression and others diseases.

This study examined preservice elementary education students' sense of efficacy regarding student engagement, instructional strategies, and classroom management based on the type of observations they completed. A total sample size of 64 elementary education students enrolled in four sections of an introductory elementary education course and completed five hours of observation. Students in two sections of the course completed traditional face-to-face observations. Students in the other two sections of the course watched five hours of pre-recorded video observations of elementary education classroom and participated in class discussions regarding the observations. All students completed the Teachers' Sense of Efficacy Scale to measure their self-efficacy regarding student engagement, instructional strategies, and classroom management. Research was conducted using a posttest, quasi-experimental, non-equivalent control group design. Data were analyzed using independent-samples t tests. Results of this study indicate there is no significant difference regarding preservice teachers' sense of teaching efficacy based on the type of observations completed. Future research should continue to explore how different components of teacher education programs influence preservice teachers' sense of teaching efficacy.

This study investigates how Muslim parents of pre-K and elementary public school children perceive their role in their children's education. Furthermore, the study identifies how Muslim parents describe their current parent involvement practices and the challenges they face when trying to get involved in their children's schools. To generate the data for this study, an in-depth two-tier interview was utilized with 16 Muslim families. The participants were selected purposely through recommendation process and snowballing techniques. The data collected was transcribed and analyzed for prominent patterns and themes. The findings suggest that Muslim parents value education and consider their role in educating their children as part of their religious practices that they can be rewarded for by their creator. Furthermore, Muslim parents enact many involvement practices at home and at the school. The study findings also suggest that Muslim parents perceive many challenges while trying to get involved in their children's schools. The structure of activities provided from the school, schools' failure to attend to their children's religious needs, and feelings of discrimination and racism are major factors that limit the involvement of Muslim parents in their children's schools. Findings suggest that Muslim parents resist the challenges they face by either withdrawing from participation in the schools or through becoming more involved. The implications of this study support the notion that school could enhance the parent involvement of Muslims by providing them with a more inclusive space based on understanding the particularities of their culture.

This phenomenological study explores the lived experiences of two elementary pre-service teachers in a Mid-western rural university in an attempt to heighten the quality and depth of those experiences as they pertain to pre-service teacher preparation prior to student teaching. The study analyzed the pre-service teachers' descriptions of their lived experiences in elementary schools during internship experiences and how those experiences contributed to their personal growth as educators.

Flick's (2009) recommendations for phenomenological data analysis of personal journals and face-to-face interviews was used as a methodological framework for exploration of the two pre-service teachers' lived experiences while Van Manen's (1990) journal and interview methodologies were used for data collection. The findings were represented in thematic format and revealed transformational learning experiences for both participants. The six phenomenological themes captured the essences of teacher and student relationships and how classroom experiences contributed to personal learning opportunities for the pre-service teachers. Moreover, the findings of this study bolstered the necessity for pre-service teachers to reflect upon and evaluate interpersonal and intrapersonal lived experiences as they relate to the basic tenets of phenomenology in order to gain a fuller appreciation for how lived experiences of pre-service teachers, and their students, contribute to professional growth and improved decision-making skills. This study argues for a more attuned investigation of the basic tenets of phenomenology to increase student achievement through improved teacher and student relationships, and to enhance pre-service teachers' personal and professional learning.
