Employing the interpretive descriptive methodology, this qualitative study was designed to explore parents' moral experiences of nursing care at the end-of-life in the pediatric intensive care unit, and was analyzed through a lens of nursing ethics.

Face-to-face, semi-structured interviews were conducted with eleven parents (six mothers and five fathers) of six children who died in a pediatric intensive care unit at a university-affiliated tertiary hospital in Eastern Canada. Study results revealed close connections between parents' abilities to meaningfully parent a child through their death and the nursing care that they received at the end-of-life, and highlighted the varying helpful guiding roles that nurses adopted at different moments in parental experiences.

Paediatric

Intensive Care

Results also indicated that parents attributed immense value to feeling that nurses cared-for-and-about their child and the parents themselves, since this made parents feel that their child's death mattered to the nurses whom they had formed relationships with. This study

Setting: The neonatal intensive care unit, the cardiac intensive care unit, and the pediatric intensive care unit at a single urban pediatric hospital.

Subjects: Eighteen

six from each unit,
were observed.

Methods: Each
nurse was observed during patient care for a 4-hr period. Heart rate and sound

were recorded continuously

using personal heart rate monitors and dosimeters (personal and hand-held) while stress ratings were collected pre-, mid-, and post-observation.

Variables assessed as potential confounders were age, height, weight, BMI, years of nursing experience, caffeine intake, and patient census.

Descriptive statistics were computed to determine the mean and standard deviations for the different effects. A repeated measures analysis of variance (ANOVA) with a within-subjects design was utilized to determine if noise different independent variables. Main Results: Overall, the average sound pressure level was about 78 dBA, with a range between 50 and 101 dBA. While the overall average heart rate

Acces PDF

Paediatric

Intensive Care

Unit Nursing

Procedure

was greater than 75 bmp, some activities and locations had a significant influence on heart rate. The neonatal intensive care unit recorded the highest average sound pressure level as well as heart rate. The maximum distribution of noise recordings were found in patient rooms; during support activities and employee interactions; and caused by staff communication.

Acces PDF

Paediatric

Intensive Care

Unit Nursing

Procedure

Mild correlations between noise and heart rate were significant as a function of unit, location, activity, and source.

Conclusions:

Overall, the results indicate that intensive care units have high levels of noise

which are driven by

communication between nurses
and patients and in-room
equipment.

Further, these levels require immediate attention through effective interventions - engineering controls and behavioral changes. While the impact of noise on heart rate is less conclusive, mild correlations were found and may indicate that noise can produce adverse health outcomes (e.g. elevate cardiovascular risk). The bottom line is that ICUs have significant amount of noise that can adversely impact the nurse

Family Centred Care (FCC) is practiced in paediatrics and certainly accentuated in the PICU as there is usually only one patient assigned
