Hong Kong in October 2006 This thesis reports the results of two studies, 1) a cross-sectional study to investigate the oral health condition, oral microbial profile, saliva flow and health-related quality of life (HRQoL) of Sjogren's syndrome (SS) patients; and 2) a randomized double-blind, placebo-controlled crossover clinical trial (RCT) to assess the effect of cevimeline on oral health condition, oral microbial profile, saliva flow and HRQoL in SS patients. A total of 82 southern Chinese subjects participated in the cross-sectional study including primary SS (pSS), secondary SS (sSS) patients and non-SS subjects. Oral health condition, oral microbial profile and saliva flow were determined using verified clinical and laboratory techniques. HRQoL was evaluated using the SF-36, OHIP and a dry mouth questionnaire. Primary SS patients had a greater prevalence of oral candidiasis and xerostomic tongue changes (P Fifty southern Chinese SS patients entered and 44 completed the 24-week RCT. They were randomly assigned to receive cevimeline (30 mg three times per day) for 10 weeks (first arm) then stopped for 4 weeks (washout) before switching to take placebo for another 10 weeks (second arm) or receive placebo in the first arm and cevimeline in the second arm. first trial medication (week 10), after the washout period (week 14) and after taking the second trial medication (week 24). Patient satisfaction and preference were recorded after each trial medication (weeks 10 and 24). On taking cevimeline, there was a significant improvement of the GOHAI scores, as compared to placebo ( $P = 0.001$ ). No significant differences were detected among other investigated parameters between cevimeline and placebo, except a reduction in the C. albicans level in plaque after cevimeline use. Cevimeline was effective in improving the OHRQoL and oral microbial profile of SS sufferers. However, it had no effects on oral health condition and saliva flow in SS sufferers. Patient preference and satisfaction were
